Never Saw Visitors.

NEW YORK Aug. 31, 1894.

I have known the people referred to for over a year and a haif. I was housekeeper in two houses in which the women lived, and know them to be hardworking and most respectable people. Their characters are above reproach, and upon no occasion have I ever geen or heard of their baving male visitors. They worked hard for a living, and took in washing to support themselves after the death of Mrs. Rhein's husband. They have always borne themselves in a ladylike manner. They never kept any liquor for sale to my knowledge.

when the reporter called to see Mrs. Bahls she was very much excited over the affair. She exhibited a dress which she said that Miss Liekner had worn on the day of her arrest, and it was badly torn, as if in a struggle. She and several other copie were on hand when the women were arraigned in court, but were not allowed to testify. In the neighborhood of the women's home there were many who spoke of the affair in bitter terms, and were unanimous in giving the women the highest words of praise.

A peculiar part of the story, to say the least, and one which the policemen will be asked to explain in regard to the

I have been housekeeper in toe spartment-house 301 Kans Seventy-sixth street for seventy wars. The women in question have lived in this house three different times, and I know them to be hard-working people. They carned their living by taking in washing, and I have seen them at their work daily. I have never during my acquaintsince with them witnessed or ever heard of their actions being anything but good and pure liver.

J. L. Hague, a young man from Brooklyn, declares that he was drugged and robbed in Chatham Square Saturday night.

He says that he was in a saloon on Chatham Square at 10 o'clock, when two fellows asked him to treat. He was sober up to that moment, but when he treated the fellows he declares he lost all rememberance of what occurred. He awoke at about midnight, lying upon a pile of stones in Frankfort street, under the bridge.

His pockets were empty. His money, a small amount, and a sliver watch were gone. He reported the case to the Oak street police. He says that the watch is inscribed. "From J. W. Hall to M. J.
